Handel's dramatic cantata 'Apollo e Dafne' was composed during the years he spent in Italy. This is a particularly fascinating period in Handel's career, since it marks the end of his apprenticeship years in Germany and the beginning of the full flowering of his genius. Furthermore the works of this period are not only interesting in themselves but also for the way in which they represent an artistic storehouse of ideas from which Handel was drawing until the end of his life. In this early maturity the stream of his inspiration flowed so rapidly and freshly that in later years he turned again and again to it as a source of creative material. Handel left Hamburg in 1706 and remained in Italy until 1710, having visited most of the chief musical centres. In Rome, where Handel first arrived in 1707, he devoted a great deal of his energies to the composition of chamber cantatas, which were at that time enjoying an especial popularity. This was due to a papal ban on opera, which caused the musical public who were determined opera-lovers to turn to the chamber cantata as a kind of substitute. Most of the cantatas were quite short, but they contained much the same forms of aria and recitative as were to be heard in the contemporary operas and dealt with similar emotional situations. Some of them were quite long and amounted to self-contained dramatic scenes without action.

'Apollo e Dafne' is one of these large-scale dramatic cantatas. The narrative is carried through by means of the type of recitativo secco common to the operatic conventions of the day, and alternating with recitatives are arias which comment upon the various emotional situations. In the opening recitative and aria Apollo proclaims his triumph over the monster that had been the terror of Greece, and boasts that the whole world owes its preservation to the power of his conquering arm. In the scoring of the aria Handel makes much use of dialogue between oboes, bassoon and strings. Apollo then expresses his scorn for the vaunted might of Cupid, saying that one who has merely wounded a thousand lovers cannot be compared with one who, like himself, has slain a serpent single-handed. In an aria that starts with a mock-martial refrain on oboes and bassoon, he tells Cupid to break his bow since he has no hope of touching him with his arrows.

Now Dafne is heard singing in a grove sacred to Diana. In an aria which is one of the most appealing that Handel ever wrote, she describes her happiness in the service of the goddess and tells of the joy that awaits those that know true liberty. The scoring of this aria is most original, the oboe solo being accompanied by violins, violas and cellos pizzicato with the doublebass playing arco and sustaining the actual bass line. Much of the time Handel adopts a kind of organ registration for the pizzicato strings in that the violas play an octave below the first violins and the cellos an octave below the second violins.

On hearing Dafne's song Apollo is enraptured by her singing and by her beauty. He pleads his suit but Dafne repulses him. In an aria in which solo oboe and solo violin are the obbligato instruments, she repeats her vows of loyalty to Diana. A brief but heated exchange of conflicting views leads to a spirited duet in which the two characters express their respective emotions. Apollo continues his endeavours by warning Dafne that the charms she now possesses are fleeting and will perish in the course of time. In an aria of great lyrical power he holds up to her the example of the rose whose beauty may flourish one day and be gone the next. Another short and sharp exchange in recitative introduces a kind of dialogue aria in which Apollo entreats to the pleading strains of a solo flute and Dafne asserts her determination with the agitated accompaniment of strings.

The scene now rises to its climax. Apollo declares that he will love Dafne for ever; she replies that she will hate him for as long and flees from his passionate approach. The chase begins and the two protagonists are graphically represented in the music by solo violin and solo bassoon respectively, but just at the moment when Apollo thinks he has caught Dafne, she is miraculously changed into a laurel. In the final recitative and aria the now repentant Apollo pays homage to the tree and declares that its leaves shall for ever be a symbol of renown.

Apollo :

La terra è liberata,
La Grecia è vendicata,
Apollo ha vinto!
Dopo tanti terrore tante stragi che
Desolano e spopolano i regni giace
Piton per la mia mano estinto.
Apollo ha trionfato
Apollo, Apollo ha vinto!

Aria (Apollo) :

Pende il ben dell'universo
Da quest' arco salutar.
Ch'il superbetto
Amore de le saette
Mie ceda a la forza;
Ch'omai più non si vanti
De la punta fatal d'aurato strale;
Un sol Piton più vale
Che mille accesi
E saettati amanti.

Aria (Apollo) :

Spezza l'arco e getta l'armi
Dio dell'ozio e del piacer.
Come mai puoi tu piagarmi,
Numeignudo e cieco arcier,
Numeignudo e cieco arcier.

Aria (Dafne) :

Felicissima quest'alma
Felicissima, quest'alma, ch'ama sol la libertà, la libertà.

Apollo :

Che voce! Che beltà!
Questo suon, questa vista
Il contra passa : Ninfa!

Dafne :

Che veggo? ahi lassa;
e chi sarà costui,
che mi sorprese.
